Systems Theory & Accelerationism

A while back, around when I first moved to Substack, I wrote an article that better defined accelerationism in the context of NS. This was because it was often confused with both the Landian usage of the term or some general notion of "things need to get worse" for some reason or another. The specific context was around who RWers should vote for in the last election. Regardless, it was limited in scope & didn't necessarily make a case for the idea beyond clarifying the thought process behind it. It was also one of my first articles so it was probably terrible.

To reiterate what was said in that article, accelerationism is not letting your enemies win. At no point from the founding of the NSLF to the disbandment of AWD was the goal to just let our enemies have power in hopes of forcing people to do something if things get bad enough. Dr. Pierce didn't say this, nor did James Mason. This was never the program & has never worked historically.

This is because accelerationism is not predicated on ideology, it's simply a realpolitik strategy. When one talks about "accelerating the collapse," this doesn't mean pushing society to the left endlessly. It refers purely to the 'system,' which is the combination of organizations that hold power & support the present sociopolitical order in the country. The entire government apparatus is of course the main part of this, however it also includes the major corporations, NGOs, influencers, and other support networks.

The system shouldn't be taken as an omnipotent boogeyman, a demon lording over the minds of men. The system is simply an organization, an extension of what the government already is. For our purposes, organizations like major banks, the ADL, moderate political organizations, and others can be considered part of the System even if not a part of the government. It should be noted that the System is not something that is consciously designed, it is an emergent phenomenon that arises naturally through the process of human sociology. As such, the system we face today was not created by a group of evildoers in a shadowy room, it naturally developed as an organism over time.

Although, the first NatSocs to formally adopt the strategy of underground militancy was the National Socialist Liberation Front, this process began a few years prior through one of the most important figures in far-right politics - Dr. William Luther Pierce. For those unaware, Pierce was a longtime member of the original ANP & spent his life dedicated to the cause. He was a supporter of the NSLF & authored The Turner Diaries, a book that fundamentally changed far-right & even libertarian politics for decades. This is all common knowledge, but what you may not know is that him is that he had a doctorate in & later was a professor of physics. It was through this that he became educated on systems theory.

Systems theory (ST) is, in the absolute simplest terms, the study cohesive groups of interconnected & interdependent components working as a single larger entity. ST is a broadly applied concept, used in virtually every discipline, but the specific field we must focus on in Social ST. This is the theory applied to human societies. This is also where we get the term 'System' from, as opposed to "the establishment" or "the man." The main thing to focus on is that human societies are fundamentally complex adaptive systems. This contrasts to ordered systems, in which the components are heavily constrained, & chaotic systems, in which there is no order among the components. Complex adaptive systems are a middle ground in which the components & the system evolve simultaneously. The system constrains the components lightly but the components also influence the system via their interactions.

For example, an ordered system could be said to be like a prison or military unit. Its components, the people, are heavily constrained & thus exist for the system. A chaotic system can be thought of as a room full of different animals, with no common rules. The system is not tangibly real, beyond chaos theory. Complex adaptive systems can be visualized as a group of children doing an art project, there is a goal which instills a directive but the individual children also influence the overall group. Of course, most human societies fall into the third group due to our naturally social nature mixed with the inherent egoism of any rational being. The individual parts of a society influence it as much as the society influences them. This isn't strictly universal however, as many human societies can be considered ordered systems based on the amount of freedom given to its parts, such as the aforementioned military or penal systems.

What's important to note about these systems is that they are driven by a purpose, or at least move towards a sort of end state. For the purposes of ecology, this can be seen in the gradual evolution towards a self-sufficient & stable ecosystem. For the purposes of humanity, this is ideology (note: religion, worldview, and similar terms will be folded under the umbrella of 'ideology' for our purposes). Ideologies are what give a society a purpose, a goal to strive towards beyond the basic principles of tribal survival. Certain ideologies can be said to be superior to others, but this is an issue of valuation & such.

One can glean the purpose of the System from its prevailing ideology, the things it champions & the things it suppresses. For some, this is very obvious. Nazi Germany was National Socialist, the party was very clear about its stated goals & purpose for its system. Similarly, the early Soviet Union had the clear purpose of being the core of the global Marxist struggle. The liberal democracies of the West are a bit harder to ascertain, unless you deeply study the value system of modern liberalism. More importantly, it's cooption by the modern financial system & the Marxian infection since the 1960's.

The ideological foundations for the System are of supreme importance, as undermining this undermines the legitimacy of the System itself in the eyes of its constituents. A good example is the collapse of the monarchical structure of government in Europe, whether in France or Russia. What truly motivated this abrupt change was that the revolutionaries did not follow the same ideology as the kings. It was irrelevant whether the king was good or bad, as they didn't want the kingship to exist at all.

This is the core issue that many fail to realize when they criticize the "uniparty," that is the issue that virtually all parties in western governments have virtually identical beliefs & only disagree on minor points or exact policy. The truth is that this is how all systems work, it's a requirement to maintain civil order. These governments also put substantial effort into limiting the ability to peacefully change the system, as it was discovered in the interwar period that if a party is elected that doesn't love liberalism & democracy, they will simply get rid of them. Undermining the prevailing ideology of the system is the purpose of activism, for radicals anyway.

One thing that's important to remember is that the System is not a monolith, do not fall into schizophrenic delusions of some shadowy cult hiding in a cave. The System is a group of organizations made up of individuals. It has its own factions within its ideological constraints, and it can shift over time. For example, we can easily say that the CIA & FBI are both part of the System, but they still exist on their own with sometimes contradictory goals. This can be extrapolated to political parties as well. It's not simply fake political theater, these parties do genuinely disagree, although they are still under the same general ideology.

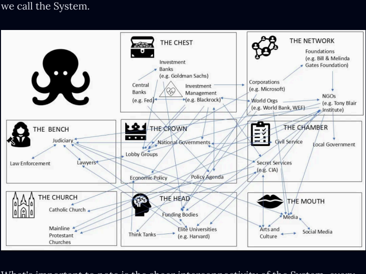

Which brings up the Trump question. Prior to the election, there was a significant argument over whether or not those on the far-right (NS or otherwise) should bother voting Trump. I also touched on this a few months before election day, my position was that Trump is worth having in office purely because it gives us the opportunity to slow demographic replacement & move the overall RW further. I made it extensively clear that I have no faith that Trump, or the mainstream RW at this time, is anywhere close to an actual solution. Most people that I follow had the same opinion, and generally refrained from trying to kill the enthusiasm before the election.

Moreover, the primary reason I supported Trump is that he is anti-establishment. The various events that occurred between the questionable 2020 election, attempts to imprison him, & multiple assassination attempts have made this even more pronounced. Slavoj Žižek, a 'left populist' philosopher, made this case surprisingly well all the way back in 2016. Despite his leftism, he said he would vote for Trump purely because it would shake up the status quo. It would crack the hegemony & sew dissent. Now, 9 years down the road, we can see he was right. Politics in the West, both electoral & otherwise, has permanently changed. The ideology that guided the System from the early 70's to the Obama administration had its legs kicked out from under it. The Democrats will never be able to put someone like Clinton on the ballot again, Republicans would never be able to put Romney on. The left & right are no longer defined by politicians or even any discussions happening in Congress, it's become decentralized & extended well to the left & right on both sides.

The various components of a system may periodically find tension between themselves, this is normal. But components being outright hostile to each other is a recipe for failure. In biological organisms, this is generally referred to as cancer. The underwhelming first Trump admin proved several things. Firstly, it showed that there is no political solution. Even without doing the math regarding demographics, any one who wins is ultimately beholden to a massive network of judges & the "deep state" which prevents them from causing any meaningful change. This should be obvious, in biological terms these entities function as a sort of immune system.

Regardless, this immune system isn't invulnerable. As we have seen in the past few months, a populist figure can cause chaos. After all of the turmoil Trump faced with the System trying to limit his power in the first term & prevent the second term, he has decided to simply confront the immune system head on. I highly doubt he has the balls to outright ignore a SCOTUS order or fully clean out the FBI, but the active attempts to weaken its power is enough. Like Martin Luther's moderate calls for reform foreshadowing the end of Catholic hegemony & the 30 Years War.

Below is a graphic representation of what Curtis Yarvin calls the "Cathedral," which is a fairly accurate representation of & more or less analogous to what we call the System.

What's important to note is the sheer interconnectivity of the System, every component is deeply reliant on the others. This is simultaneously a benefit & a weakness. The benefit is that the System is essentially invisible, only certain sections are public facing. The front end, if you will. The back end, where most important actions occur is poorly known & understood even by those with interests in such matters. Further, the decentralized nature of the System makes it very difficult to effectively combat. It is an adaptive entity, that will evolve to meet new threats. Remember, social systems of any sort are fundamentally organisms above all. They will behave as such. Fortunately, this opens up the decentralized System to another topic within ST - cascading failure.

Cascading failure is a situation where the failure of one (or more) components of a system cause a chain reaction that leads to a complete failure of the overall system. The easiest way to describe this, & the most common real world example, is in electrical infrastructure. A common cause of blackouts is the failure of a single component, such as a power substation. Naturally, this will lead to failures of the downstream infrastructure as well. However, the missing link causes other components to compensate for it, leading to them overloading & failing as well. Eventually, this also leads to components upstream of the original fault to fail as well. This is a progressive process, it can occur slowly overtime or instantaneously. There is also a biological analogue, both in individual organisms & wider ecosystems, such as immune response overshoot or the extinction of a species leading to the extinction of others.

The individual components of the System are more or less meaningless on their own. The Open Society Foundation would be entirely irrelevant without its allies in governance which would be powerless without their enforcers (ADL, FBI, law enforcement, etc.). Certain components can be seen as upstream or downstream from one another, but all serve a purpose in the grand scheme.

As was previously mentioned, the majority of social organizations are complex adaptive systems. However, during times of perceived crisis the System can begin shifting towards an ordered system. This can be seen in the US (& other western countries) in the past several decades, where the System's ideology has gradually become much more specific & deviant ideologues are punished more harshly. For example, compare the situation of the KKK during the 20's to the harsh crackdown on AWD a few years ago. Compare the politics of figures like Oswald Mosley or Enoch Powell to what social media posts will get you imprisoned in Britain today.

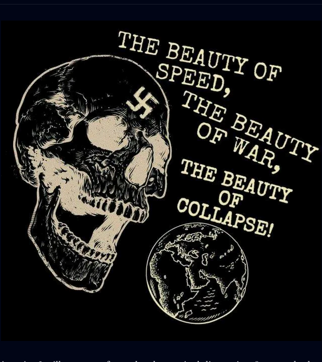

The transition to an ordered system happens concurrently to the increased complexity of society at large. While the System's parameters become more strict, the proliferation of dissident thinking spreads among those who are part of society but not the System Core (explained later). We can see this today with the rise of ideologies to the left & right of the System, as many look for ideological alternatives for some reason or another. This is essentially a defensive process, the System tries to maintain itself while a virus spreads. Fortunately, an ordered system is remarkably simpler & easy to understand. It is more visible, tangible, and thus easier to confront. It's also more susceptible to collapse, as it's less adaptive & malleable.

The System is essentially all encompassing, you're a part of it by having a job, paying taxes, appearing on the census, etc. But these small elements of the System are more or less irrelevant. Just like a corporation, a random laborer can hardly be said to be the corporation itself. This is reserved for top leadership, boards of directors, etc. Naturally, our System has its own analogue which I will call the System Core. As I've stated in previous articles, certain elements of System are not exactly fanatics. Examples include generally apolitical entities like private corporations as well as basic government services like the DMV.

The System Core would of course include the most influential ideologues of the ruling ideology, such as the aforementioned Open Society Foundation or AIPAC. I would also include most major financial institutions like Blackrock or the Federal Reserve. Organizations like these can be considered the brain. This mutually influences the top echelons of the government, such as the presidential administration & Congress (the primary members, not necessarily each & every individual). This includes much of what is today referred to as the 'Deep State.' This is the heart. The final element of the System Core is the enforcement arm. This is both the ideological & physical ~~terrorist~~ security forces of the System. The physical branch is obvious, it includes the FBI, NSA, DHS, etc. The ideological branch is less well known, but consists of organizations which work to doxx & expose individuals who commit heresy against System ideology. Many journalists are in this camp, but primarily organizations like the ADL. The people that get you fired for mean posts online. This is the immune system.

I refer to this as the System Core because they are the primary threats, the vital organs that the System as a whole cannot live without. If any of these three subsystems were to disappear, the System would wilt away quickly. Without the brain, it loses its guidance. Without the heart, it loses its decision making ability & legitimacy. Without the immune system, it loses its defenses. Another important subsystem that may be considered as part of the Core is its subsistence. This refers to the financial aspect, both the overall economic system itself & the tax system. Of course, without this the System will starve. I personally don't feel this alone is enough, so I do not consider it to be a part of the Core itself but rather a downstream subsystem (not including specific organizations like the ones mentioned earlier).

Although the System Core is of supreme importance, this does not mean that we go directly for it. The Core is reliant on all of the downstream subsystems, which can be considered "soft targets." They are much easier to assault, whether through direct action or ideological infiltration/agitation. An easy example is the accelerationist obsession with power stations. The idea behind destroying such infrastructure is to force the System to focus on real issues (providing services to its citizens) instead of pursuing its ideological agenda, as well as bleeding resources from the System. A similar concept is what inspires the Houthis' actions against commercial shipping, which has effectively shut down trade through the Suez Canal & had a myriad of economic consequences (predominantly in Europe). The ideological wing conducts activism in order to undermine the System ideology at lower levels, recruiting supporters & influencing the conversation.

At this point I will move on from the theoretical discussion & towards the praxis, how we actually implement this on the ground. But first, why this strategy is necessary instead of just coopting the System & using it for our own agenda.

Contrary to the claims of derads & naysayers, the move away from standard politics & towards radical action was not the work of random psychopaths or bad actors. It was a simple evaluation of the reality of the situation, both how it actually works & how it suppresses any real change. The first revolutionary thinker was Dr. Pierce, arguably the most respectable member of the movement throughout its history & someone that was well educated on relevant matters. Similarly, NSLF founder Joseph Tommasi was a longtime ANP member that was well respected among his peers, despite his ethnic handicap.

The issue that the thinkers of "White Nationalism 2.0," figures like Richard Spencer or Thomas Rousseau, have when looking back at the history of the movement is that they failed to look past the immediate ten years. Their frame of reference was limited to the horrid NSM & the pop culture conception of skinheads. This can be forgiven for younger members that took part in the revival of the 2010's, but eventually this turned into a neurotic denial of history in a desperate attempt to maintain "optics." As a reminder, this idea of maintaining good optics & presenting a moderate image was already attempted when the ANP changed to the National Socialist White Peoples Party. It was the exact same thought process we heard from the old AltRight groups in 2016 & still hear today from the likes of Patriot Front. It didn't work now & it isn't working now. In both cases, it led to stagnation & decline while true believers left for greener pastures.

Moreover, we must clarify that the study of the System gradually evolved in nature. Originally, in the days of NSLF & Silent Brotherhood the idea was that the System was to be destroyed. This was also believed by leftist organizations, the idea that our people must make a unified stand & engage the System head-on. During the 80's, this began to change as we evaluated the trajectory of the System & the historical records of civilization collapse. This became more pronounced by watching the fall of the USSR & Yugoslavia, as well as later events like the breakup of Libya & Syria.

What we learned from all this was that System decline is absolutely inevitable given all of the aggravating factors. As an organism, it is subject to the Red Queen Theory, which is the ecological concept that a species must constantly adapt & evolve in order to stave off extinction. The main point of the theory is the a species can go extinct at any time, it's been applied to the longevity of societies due to a similar time-independent pattern of decline or collapse.

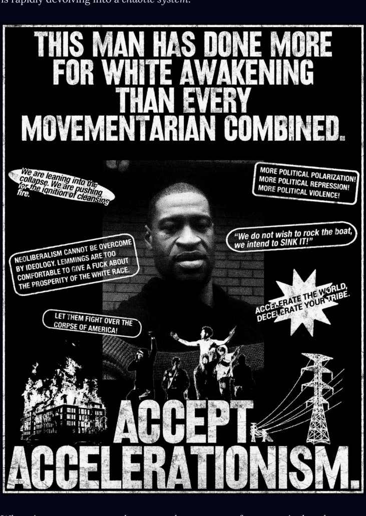

A few important factors that are contributing to collapse are mutually hostile factions within the System (Trumpian Rs & "woke" Dems, as opposed to the previously similar political establishment), economic issues (both with how the current system is designed & with the consumers), environmental issues, loss of a concrete global hegemony, demographic change/conflict, proliferation of ideologies counter to the System's, aging populations, recent weakening of the immune system, various "culture war" issues, cultural decline, interference from foreign governments, rising debt, forcing the population into unnatural lifestyles, massive spread of mental health issues, degrading critical infrastructure, elite overproduction, extreme inequality, weakening faith in the System (especially after events like the Epstein case), exposure of hidden organs like the deep state, social fragmentation, declining cultural capital, severe decline in social cohesion, long term failure of welfare systems, & most importantly the sheer size/complexity of System.

I invite any of you to research the individual factors I listed on your own.

A clear headed look at all of these issues, regardless of any agenda, shows a collision course. This isn't fantastical thinking, it's the natural process that has fated every society in human history at some point or another. I should also mention that accelerationists don't necessarily believe that the collapse should happen, or that we should play an active role in it, but rather that it's an inevitability. If anything, it's better to get it over with now instead of letting it drag on unnecessarily & make the situation worse. This is why organizations like Atomwaffen & The Base didn't have the goal of directly ripping down the System, but merely surviving it. Hard accelerationists, like the Terrorgram crowd, had the view of inflaming social instability as much as possible to aggravate the situation.

The System knows this as well, even in its late game it is still an adaptive system. This can be seen in the massive increase of federal power in the last several decades. In prior years, it would simply ignore groups like the KKK. Now, even very moderate organizations like Patriot Front face the full power of the System through legal warfare, FBI subversion, & media hysteria. The continuous erosion of firearms rights, the PATRIOT Act, the recent laws against antisemitism. These are all attempts by the System to preserve itself.

The largest aggravating factors have occurred in the last ten years. The divergence of the mainstream Left into the SJW/Woke crowd & the divergence of the mainstream Right into Trumpian populism, as well as the proliferation of progressive movements like the Alt & Dissident Right. The spread of violent anti-government sentiment. The BLM riots & subsequent racial issues accelerating tribalistic ethnic conflict. The questionable 2020 election, exposure of the deep state, Epstein case, and more eroding trust & confidence in the present system. I doubt I even need to touch on the maelstrom of issues downstream of the COVID pandemic/lockdown. While the System itself gradually moved towards an ordered system, society at large is rapidly devolving into a chaotic system.

Whats important to note about complex systems, of any sort, is that they are always prone to failure in very short time. This is the cascading failures I spoke of earlier, where one component failing leads to the failure of the entire system. This is important because social systems are the same way, virtually no example of societal collapse can be narrowed down to a single point of failure. Rather, there's usually a myriad of factors before things hit a breaking point. Before we hit the point of Total System Collapse. The keystone factor is more aptly described as the straw that broke the camels back. This can happen in remarkably short time, as I've previous written about when looking at the fall of the USSR. This was an unexpected event until the 11th hour, even if the collapse seems simple in retrospect.

In our situation, the decline seems remarkably similar to the conditions of the USSR in the 1980's. I previously compared Trump to Gorbachev near the end of my article on Balkanization, I continue to hold by this view. In effect, Trump's election & recent reforms are themselves a failure of the System. We can see that even as a fairly lukewarm conservative faction, the System was intent on keeping him out to the point of attempting to imprison & possibly kill him. These actions during the Biden admin can be seen as roughly analogous to the 1991 August Coup, where Communist hardliners attempted to seize control from the Gorbachev administration. This isn't an exact match, though I think something similar will happen if Trump fails (again) to adequately liquidate the establishment/deep state. It should be noted that the August Coup was the final nail in the coffin of the USSR, please research yourself.

What many fail to realize is that accelerationism isn't limited to killing the mailman or shooting up the local power substation. When an organization like NSC-131 or Blood Tribe drops a banner or flies a flag with a swastika, they're accelerating both political radicalism & social distress. It's easy to be leftist & imagine all those evil nazis are just internet trolls. The anxiety they feel driving to work & seeing a group of these evil nazis demonstrating on the streets of their own city must be unimaginable. Every government action that can be considered politically partisan, left or right, accelerates by putting pressure on the opposition. This is why I fully, 100% support Trump's decision to make antisemitism illegal. Between that & the widespread knowledge of AIPAC, it's now ridiculously easy to convince people that we are occupied by ZOG.

Something that should not be ignored is that the acceleration of radicalism is not limited to various ideologues, it applies to the System itself as well. Like any animal backed into a corner, it will (and has) take increasingly drastic measures to protect itself. Trump deciding to send unwanted migrants to a prison camp in El Salvador is, regardless of how funny it is, a dark precedent for dissidents. We don't have too much to worry about now, but when the left inevitably regains power it will be a dangerous situation. Think the US extraditing citizens to the UK for "hate speech" violations online, where they can be prosecuted under draconian UK laws despite never stepping foot in that country. More importantly, the primary focus of the intelligence apparatus & counter-terrorism racket has shifted to the homefront. Since Islamic terrorism has been more or less irrelevant since 2019, the new conflict is the War on Domestic Terrorism, whether you define that as retards torching Teslas or NS militants. The establishment is quite desperate to prevent anyone like the Weatherman Underground or Silent Brotherhood from instigating a new Days of Rage. In all likelihood, they won't survive this time, under current conditions. To make a long story short, this means sending militants (& possibly activists) to Gitmo or Salt Pit style black sites & giving them the Abu Ghraib treatment.

If you think this is fantastical, you're delusional. American citizens that joined Al-Qaeda faced this already, such as Ahmed Onar Abu Ali. Also, take a simple look at how the System's immune system dealt with dissidents in Waco, Ruby Ridge, Robert Matthews, etc. These people paid Joshua Sutter nearly $100k & financed his books about satanism & child sexual abuse purely to hurt the reputation of AWD. There is no realistic limit to what the System will do to defend itself.

As for the Collapse, the breaking point of the System, don't buy into some Mad Max style fantasy. When the System goes terminal, the standard social system will likely resemble a chaotic system. The old parameters are no longer present, there's no one to enforce the rules. Collapse will hurt some places hard than others, but things are more at the whim of chance. As always, there is a rhythm in the chaos for those with trained senses. For articles covering the Collapse in depth (specifically from our POV as militants) see The Collapse & Post-America, Years of Lead, & Balkanization. Collapse isn't an end goal, it's just a means to an end. Destruction of the current order so that something, anything, can rise from the ashes. It only emphasizes the principle of struggle that is necessary to enact our agenda.

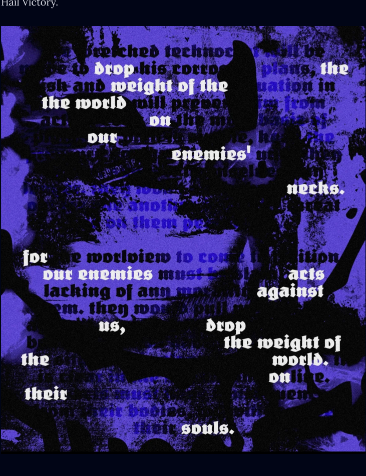

Creative Chaos.

The optimistic take on this is that it is inevitable, just as much Spengler's civilizational decline or any spiritual theory about a "dark age." All of the signs are there, compounding on each other. Hairline fractures spread rapidly, like a dam about to bust. Given how much success we've had in the last 10 years, despite the absolute best efforts of the System to censor, discredit, & outright arrest us, it's difficult to image what success we'll have when it's gone. When there's no active measures to combat us & there is no 'default' ideology. Every action that leads to instability, regardless of who commits it or if they're even conscious of it, is supporting the revolutionary cause.

The best course of action, as I always harp on, is to prepare. Tribe & train. Form Manson Family style tribes to ride out the chaos with. Never forget the principle of struggle.
